“ It's difficult to imagine the world without Andy. Even though it has been a long time since we saw each other face-to-face, I always looked forward to the oddball and humorous things he would post online. In a world that easily can make a person angry, or to take things too seriously; Andy chose to also look at the part of the world that makes us smile or laugh. This is a good approach to life, and while filled with humor, it is a serious lesson for all of us. That he maintained a mischievous nature throughout his life makes me love him even more, and miss him more. From an early age, it was apparent that Andy was highly intelligent and talented. At age four he could read the NY Times flawlessly, back when the NYT was still worth reading. He read a long column to me, and the only word that stumped him was "Socrates." Ironically, he would go on to become somewhat Socratic himself in a number of ways. And, like Socrates, taken from the world too soon. Rather than dwell on my own sorrow too much, I am thinking of his family and friends who I know also feel this hole that has been punched into their lives without warning. Yes Andy, your dog is included when I mention family.
